All these emotions and more are examined in BLUE SURVIVOR, a small but powerful collection of songs and stories and one novella, by author David Boyer, whose novella MYSTERY INDIANA has received wide praise within the Hoosier state for its powerful examination of troubled youth and one author's long journey home in solving the mystery of a young woman's mysterious disappearance in 1975. Short in length but extremely powerful in its impact on the reader, BLUE SURVIVOR very well may elicit long-dormant emotions in the reader they thought they

Praise for David Boyer: "This particular work of Mr. Boyer's, though not as replete with dazzling psychological insights as his other works, has a purity and clarity that distinguishes it from the works of other authors who write about the lost and forlorn that makes it not only informative about the human condition, but very much worth reading." Employee Jack Jones after he receives an unexpected death sentence from his doctor. Jack works at Steadyland -- the world's biggest, most successful and well-known amusement park. Designed and built in Beatrice, California in the early 1950's by animation genius Gomer Steady, the Park reinvented itself over time by incorporating tons of cutting-edge technology as it grew in popularity. But some of these entertainment advances came at a high price. The computer-driven animated technology known as audioroboticals was developed in secret, with little or no oversight

During a period of rapid expansion, management installed those nasty little audiorobotics all over the Park. There were thousands of robots in the much-loved (and much-hated) It's A Doll's World and The Polynesian Bird Room.
